I purchased "Level Three Leadership" for an upper-level undergraduate management class, a class that is mostly online and self-directed. Having never taken a management course before, I found the information presented there-in to be both valuable and useful. There is much information about management styles and models, and about the changing face of leadership in the modern age. I have changed

Level Three leadership can be taken generally as an attempt to get below the surface in leading and managing others. This effort, and it is an effort, means first, an awareness of some of the complexity of human behavior and second, trying to use that complexity to have a deeper, longer-lasting impact on those around you. It means thinking about how people think and about what they value and
