In The Devil's Footprints, the narrator is a classic Burnside protagonist- lonely, serious and utterly dark. He is plagued by the miseries of his past and present. An existentialist novel in many ways, the narrator is besotted with a 14-year-old girl a la Humbert Humbert, who he believes doesn't read!

A quasi-mystery that spends too much time within the mind of the uninteresting first-person narrator. The Scottish-born Burnside (A Lie About My Father: A Memoir, 2007, etc.) returns to his native land with a plot that suggests the presence of the devil in an isolated seaside village, while leaving the identity of that devil open-ended.
